“Time for bed, sleepyhead,” Mama said, pulling her son close and giving him a big kiss on the forehead.

He rolled his eyes. “Mama, I’m too old for kisses.”

“Oh, kiddo, you are never too old for kisses.”

“Never?”

“Never ever.”

“What happens when I’m a hundred zillion years old?”

“When you are a hundred zillion years old, we’ll be with God in heaven and he’ll be showering us both with love.”

“Kisses are good,” she continued. “It’s how mothers show their children how much we love them.”

“Does every mother give mama kisses?”

An illustration of a mother and son in a bedroom at night. The mother, with long dark hair, is sitting on the edge of a bed and leaning forward to kiss the son's cheek. The son, with curly brown hair, is sitting up in bed looking at his mother. The room has light blue walls. A window on the left shows a night scene with a red barn and a windmill under a starry sky. On a shelf in the background, there is a framed picture of a football player, a small sailboat, a clock, and a red toy car. A red biplane is on the bed next to the mother. A tree branch with green leaves is in the top left corner.

“Well, I don’t know about sloths,” Mama said.

“Sloth kisses would be very slow.
Like this,” she said, leaning in for a long smooch on his cheek.

“Mama!” he laughed.
